TONGA

'Ōku Tauhi 'e he Tui 'a e kakai' – The king takes care of the people

As the only Pacific nation to never lose indigenous governance or be colonised, Tonga has earned its title of 'The Kingdom'. While this name represents the thousand-year monarchy that continues to shape Tongan life, it also reflects the pride of a country that has fought to retain self-rule despite oceans of tenacious European explorers. Tonga's uninterrupted authority over their own affairs has helped to preserve many aspects of ancient Polynesian culture, and has ensured that The Kingdom remains one of the world's most authentic and unspoilt traveller's destinations. It is also regarded as one of the most laid-back, and is therefore an ideal stretch of the South Pacific to pull into the slow lane. With over 170 islands and atolls forming the Tongan archipelago, natural assets from both land and sea are in leisurely abundance – though crowds and large-scale resorts are refreshingly absent. From the moment of touchdown onto the main island of Tongatapu, visitors feel embraced by the gentle rhythm of old Polynesia.

It is believed the Lapita people of Southeast Asia first inhabited Tonga's isles over 3,000 years ago. Since then, Tongan society has undergone a succession of changes, most notably its transformation into a hierarchal system of monarchy – the only one of its kind in the South Pacific. Various foreign influences have played their part in Tonga's development, though in modern times there exists a comfortable relationship between ancient Polynesian customs alongside devout worship of Christianity and the Kingdom's royal family. The islanders are united by a deep respect for spirituality and culture, as can be seen in their religious dedication to the practice of tapa (bark-cloth) making, mat weaving and traditional dance. Flights are not scheduled into Tonga on Sundays, a national day of rest, though Fua'amotu International Airport is a hub of activity throughout the week with flights from Fiji, New Zealand, Australia, and the USA. Flights to the Kingdom's other main island groups of Ha'apai and Vava'u also depart regularly.

Situated farther south than neighbouring Samoa and Fiji, Tonga enjoys a comfortable climate year round with an average annual daytime temperature of around 24°C. More rain tends to fall between February and April, which reliably assists the island's agricultural economy - one of Tonga's main domestic activities besides tourism. Squash, coconuts, watermelon and fish are the Kingdom's main exports, with fresh octopus, mud crabs, and lobsters being popular local delicacies. The islands of Tonga also offer excellent yachting, scuba diving, whale watching, fishing, surfing, and bird watching, with the Vava'u group emerging as a preferred location for adventure travel. Regardless of the activity, the gentle warmth of relaxed locals ensures that visitors to Tonga can enjoy, at their leisure, the unspoilt beauty of their beloved Kingdom.
